Generosity is the most natural outward expression on an inner attitude of compassion and loving-kindness. Dalai Lama

Dear Parents,

For the month of December, we are focusing on the character trait: Generosity. The definition of generosity is the quality of being kind, understanding, and not selfish.

When most people hear the word GENEROSITY they generally think about monetary donations and expensive gifts. However, there are many ways in which one can be generous. For example, you can give someone your undivided time and attention, share your possessions, provide empathy, and use/share your talents with others. Free acts of generosity can be more meaningful to people in need.

Some people suggest that generosity is a personality trait that either have or you don't. However, research has shown that people can develop their generosity through regular practice. Generosity is a habit that can be cultivated over time. Practicing generosity can have a lasting positive impact on you, the people around you, and the world. Like kindness and compassion, studies link generosity to increased happiness. Spending time helping others increases the givers self-esteem, gives them a sense of purpose, and decreases anxiety/depression. Practicing generosity can also be fun, uplifting, and can help you build meaningful connections with others.

You can volunteer for a local animal shelter, collect donations for a worthy cause, host a food or diaper drive, write a complimentary note to a classmate, collect toiletries for homeless shelters, help an elderly neighbor do small jobs around their house. An amazing consequence of practicing generosity is that it tends to have a ripple effect and it is contagious! Please think of fun and exciting ways to practice your generosity during this time of year because it could have far-reaching effects.

*Warm wishes,
Mrs. Escareno*
